Market Commentary

Generali Cash Fund recorded a performance of 0.20% in April 2026. Indonesia's money market in April 2026 entered a more challenging phase, shaped by rupiah depreciation pressure that briefly pushed the currency past Rp17,000 per US dollar amid escalating global geopolitical tensions. Bank Indonesia held the BI-Rate steady at 4.75%, with its policy focus shifting from supporting growth to defending exchange rate stability. Active foreign exchange interventions were deployed to limit further rupiah weakness. Despite the external headwinds, domestic banking liquidity remained ample and well-supported, with deposit rates continuing to ease as monetary transmission worked its way through the system. Short-term funding costs stayed at conducive levels, keeping interbank money market activity relatively stable. The resilience of domestic liquidity served as a key buffer, preventing exchange rate volatility from spilling more broadly into overall money market conditions.
